Bedroom etiquette 101

• CONT'D FROM 6

odour.

Nowadays there is a wide range of bath and body products that make showering an enjoyable experience and will surely prompt you to practice good hygiene without thinking twice even during the exam period. Additionally, brushing your teeth as well as flossing regularly will help prevent the bad breath boogie man and keep your partner from mild fits of gagging.

2. Get it and give it.

It's common decency to do the job right—and this should be reciprocal. One of the most impolite, and not to mention selfish, things to do is to leave your partner without letting them indulge in the big O, particularly if you've already done so yourself. And if your partner cannot reach the point of climax then quite possibly you should be Googling tips on technique rather than reading up on bedroom etiquette.

3. Don't pass gas.

Yes, it's as simple as that! If you must fart and/or burp, hold it in. I need not get into too much detail when it comes to this, but rumour has it passing gas while getting busy in the bedroom happens all too often.

Well, boys and girls, passing gas was only cute when you were in diapers, and even then that's questionable. Regardless, releasing gas from either end is sure to result in a none too pleasant experience for your partner and uneasy embarrassment for yourself. So, do you and your partner a favour and if for some reason you're unable to hold it together then simply excuse yourself to the washroom, or a corner of the room—just try not to do this midpoint during sexual activity.

If you're not already abiding by these three simple rules then begin immediately and you'll be well on your way a long and happy sex life. It looks like mom wasn't totally off her rocker when she taught you basic table manners. Of course, it could have only been to prepare you for the more sexually charged world of young adulthood.
